

Tips to improve your on-course decision making

I trust my 7-wood the most, so assuming I'm attempting to construct certainty, I might pick this club to gather some speed.

3. Know your convey yardages

One of the main choices you can make when playing is knowing when to attempt to go over the water, and when to lay up.

Further developing your decision making during these minutes is knowing which of your clubs you send off the most elevated, and the convey distances for each.

I gave an illustration today to a senior understudy whose longest convey distance was 130 yards. The ball would land a roll one more 20 or 30 yards from that point forward, yet realizing that the ball would convey 130 yards is the contrast between hitting the ball in the water, and clearing it.

4. If all else fails, club up

It's so great when the distance to your objective matches the distance you hit your clubs precisely. However, what do you do when it doesn't?

Posing yourself one basic inquiry can assist you with settling on the ideal choice: Is it better to be long or short?

Of the many courses that I play or where I instruct, the majority of the difficulty is shy of the green. An additional a club is frequently the better decision.
